

As we celebrate our 100th anniversary as an American company, we realize that few organizations ever reach such a milestone. Fewer still are making products in the same manner as they did a century ago, and even fewer are family-owned and managed. We are proud to be "centenarians," a unique achievement, but we are especially proud to be unique in those other ways.

In developing products for our 100th year, we gained a renewed appreciation for the spirit of innovation that has always been important to Fenton Art Glass. Each piece of Fenton glass represents the combined efforts of designers and skilled artisans, and each reflects the pride we take in our enterprise.

The 10 family members involved have been associated with Fenton glass for more than 250 years. Our history is a record of business success, but it is also one of warm personal relationships and of shared appreciation for the beauty and value of our products. We hope you will share in our joy and pride as we celebrate our 100th anniversary.

a Fenton Moment

The magnificent snow-covered Canaan Valley of West Virginia is celebrated by Fenton designer Robin Spindler. The snow-capped valley is portrayed against a midnight sky of Cobalt glass. This sparkling handpainted pattern features detailed woodlands and ice covered trees achieved with finely ground glass. The skill of our talented Fenton artists is showcased in this beautiful pattern. West Virginia's state bird, the cardinal, seeks shelter amidst a forest of ice capped trees.

Violet

Violet - a rich jewel tone - remains a home decor staple. Fenton's Violet glass begins with the raw materials of a glass batch - silica sand, soda ash and lime. The color results from our adding a precisely measured quantity of manganese and just a pinch of "powder blue" which contains cobalt.

Compared to other colors we produce, Violet tends to cool somewhat more quickly, so our skilled glassworkers have what they call a "short working time." They adjust to this characteristic of the glass by changing their pace as needed during production. Violet is a special challenge, but the results are well worth the effort!

Generations Collection

Looking ahead to our 100th anniversary, we realized how much the past influences the present and future, and we marveled at the evolution of the art of glassmaking, even as the crafting process remains much as it has been for centuries. The same forces that drove the creation and evolution of our business influenced the styles and colors of 100 years, and the transitions in shapes, styles and colors from Fenton's second generation through today's fourth generation. This introspection inspired the creation of the Generations Collection.
